

Toddlers behaving badly

Toddler groups are a great place for little children to learn how to share, take turns, and interact with others, particularly if they don't already have a sibling. But we've all seen children at toddler groups who aren't behaving. What can we do?

1 Remember that some things don't come naturally...

Sharing – if two children want to play with five little cars, that means two each, plus a spare – but little ones can't do the maths yet. In the same way, splitting a large lump of playdough three ways is probably beyond the ability of most two year olds! So we may need to help them share the toys fairly.

Taking turns seems simple to us, but this needs a child to be able to judge time. We have watches to help us, but they don't. They simply know that when they haven't got the toy, someone else does! Seeing life through a child's eyes helps us to understand why they act the way they do.

2 Simple rules can help even young children. It's good to make these as positive as possible. Perhaps in your toddler group you could agree some good rules about looking after toys, and being kind and helpful.

If you want to know more about encouraging good behaviour, or how to deal with tantrums, why not ask your toddler group to organise a parenting discussion? Sharing ideas with other carers can really help.

Biting: a mum's experience

Biting is usually an issue at some point – either because your child has been bitten or is the one doing the biting!

"I was given loads of advice, much of it contradictory, but there's no easy answer."

"My child quickly learned it was wrong to bite, but it took him longer to learn to control his reactions. Biting was usually frustration - or sometimes just over-excitement."

"My youngest child never bit. I realised then - I wasn't a bad parent - it's just some children bite, others never do."

"If you're lucky enough to have a child that doesn't bite – please have sympathy for those of us that do!"
